

or the average number of syllables spoken between pauses. All of the proficiency measures were given prior to the start of the program and again after one year's time.

The results showed that this group of 36 learners was rather more neurotic than extravert, and, as a consequence, was rather more anxious. Their motivation was more integratively oriented than instrumental, and they placed an emphasis on vocabulary learning and language skills. This group of students' proficiency level was not particularly high, although the students who scored high on the neurotic scale started with a higher level of proficiency. Those students who scored high on the extravert scales had lower levels of proficiency, but produced more oral output. Naturally, those anxious students had less oral output. Those students whose objective was vocabulary learning were less proficient, though those students who had more instrumentally oriented goals were more orally proficient. Students who claimed to have learning expectations that involved traditional learning styles and the use of modern facilities had higher levels of proficiency. Finally, there were overall gains on all the measures of proficiency, showing that the program was successful in increasing this group of students' language skills.
